

The Ties That Divide

---

The Ties That Divide

Ethnic Politics, Foreign Policy, and International Conflict

Stephen M. Saideman

C O L U M B I A   U N I V E R S I T Y   P R E S S      N E W   Y O R K

Columbia University Press
Publishers Since 1893
New York, Chichester, West Sussex
Copyright © 2001 Columbia University Press
All rights reserved

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Saideman, Stephen M.

The ties that divide: ethnic politics, foreign policy, and international conflict / Stephen M.
Saideman.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-231-12228-4 (cloth : alk. paper) —

ISBN 0-231-12229-2 (pbk. : alk. paper)

1. Ethnic relations—Political aspects. 2. World politics—1945— 3. International relations.
4. Culture conflict. 5. Developing countries—
Ethnic relations. I. Title.

D883 .S15 2001

327—dc21

00-047502

Casebound editions of Columbia University Press books are printed on permanent and durable acid-free paper.
Printed in the United States of America

c 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

p 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

To Beulah, Kathy, and Jessica

---

Contents

Acknowledgments ix

1. The Problem: Why Do States Take Sides in Ethnic Conflicts? 1
2. Explaining the International Relations of Ethnic Conflict 12
3. Understanding the Congo Crisis, 1960–1963 36
4. Religious Ties and the Nigerian Civil War, 1967–1970 70
5. The International Relations of Yugoslavia's Demise, 1991–1995 103
6. Quantitative Analyses of Ethnic Conflict's International Relations 154

Appendix to Chapter 6 200

7. Findings, Future Directions and Policy Dilemmas 203

Notes 223

References 249

Index 269

---

Acknowledgments

This project began as my dissertation, which I started shortly before the disintegration of Yugoslavia. The initial hope of the dissertation was to help understand what might happen if the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia collapsed. Ironically, I am not too late—as I revised the penultimate version, the Western countries intervened in Kosovo, breaking up de facto, if not de jure, the rump Yugoslav state. Further, the former Soviet Union is still disintegrating as the Chechnya conflict continues. In the time it has taken for me to complete this book, I have benefited from the assistance of many people.

The first debts I would like to acknowledge are to those who fostered the dissertation from which this book has sprung. The Institute on Global Conflict and Cooperation's Dissertation Fellowship funded my initial work on this project. Several people at IGCC, including the former directors, John Ruggie and Susan Shirk, as well as Sue Greer, Bettina Halverson, Jennifer Pournelle, and Kat Archibald, patiently answered my questions, and helped me in more ways than I can remember.

I am grateful to those who provided me with data and helped me analyze this data. Ted Robert Gurr, Anne Pitsch, Deepa Khosa, and The Center for International Development and Conflict Management at the University of Maryland have generously given me access to the Minorities at Risk Dataset, including raw data they collected. They also provided substantial assistance in using the dataset. Chapter six simply would not exist without their help. I am grateful to Douglas Van Belle, as he helped me develop my indicators for relative power that I used to code countries in chapters 3–5 and for the quantitative analyses in chapter 6. James Fearon provided crucial assistance in improving one of the indicators for linguistic differentials. My colleagues, past and present, at Texas Tech—particularly Ellen Anderson, Craig Emmert, Cherie Maestas, David Lanoue, and Grant Neeley—provided advice concerning the quantitative analyses. Michael Tomz helped me overcome some problems I had using the CLARIFY software.

I owe a great deal to those who have read this book in its previous drafts. I have asked many folks for a great deal of help, and received more than I asked or deserved. Obviously, my greatest debt is to Miles Kahler, who served as the chair of my dissertation committee. Over the years and particularly at the beginning, he provided insightful criticisms and helpful suggestions draft after draft. He constantly pushed me to clarify my points and to adjust my claims. Lisa Martin has often left me speechless as she consistently provided thorough and thoughtful comments more quickly than I had any right to expect. That she has always responded so insightfully and so quickly over the years has given me an ideal to which I aspire. Peter Cowhey provided penetrating comments on the early drafts. Conversations with Arend Lijphart, David Laitin, and Philip Roeder have greatly informed my understanding of ethnic politics. David Lake, Peter Gourevitch, and anonymous reviewers at International Organization gave me some very constructive criticism for my article published there, which summarizes much of this book, sharpening my argument. Columbia University Press's reviewers gave me very helpful ideas for improving this book. I am also indebted to Patrick James, Will Moore, and Jack Snyder for reading the penultimate draft and providing very helpful suggestions. Conversations with John Barkdull, Cherie Steele, and John Tuman were quite valuable in improving my thinking. I presented pieces of early versions of this book at a variety of conferences, and benefited from the comments from both panelists and discussants. In particular, I am grateful to David Lake, Tony Onyisi, and M. J. Peterson for their comments on my work at various conferences.

I benefited greatly from the IGCC project on the Spread and Management of Ethnic Conflict. This project began just after I finished my dissertation, so it greatly informed my revisions. While my contribution to that project is not directly related to this book, the conversations provoked by the project and the interaction with the participants stimulated my thinking. Discussions with James Fearon, George Kenney, Timur Kuran, David Lake and Donald Rothchild were especially beneficial.

I am particularly obliged to my colleagues from graduate school at UC, San Diego. Many read drafts, commented on my presentations, pushed me to improve my work, and suggested sources from other fields. Special thanks go to: David Auerswald, Deborah Avant, Brian Sala, Hendrik Spruyt, Stephen Swindle, and Michael Tierney. UCSD provided a truly supportive intellectual community—I have not been able to find anything close to it in my journeys since then.

Oberlin played as nearly as much of a role as UCSD. Isebill Gruhn and Ben Schiff were particularly important as they interested me in this line of work. Further, the students at Oberlin inspired me to think harder and more critically about my assumptions and about the world around me.

I am indebted to my co-authors: R. William (Bill) Ayres, Beth K. Dougherty, and David Lanoue. While our various projects are not directly related to this book, their contributions have informed my work, as well as relieving my workload. For that, I will always be grateful.

Cari McDonald helped corral the last bits of information I needed for this book and thanks to the Texas Tech College of Arts and Sciences for funding her research assistance. J.W. Justice and Young Choul-Kim provided valuable research during the final stages, and I owe them and the Carnegie Corporation of New York a debt for their assistance. Of course, the statements made and views expressed are solely the responsibility of the author, and not of the Carnegie Corporation.

The staff people within various Political Science Departments also made my work much easier. Christine Vaz, in particular, answered my questions, aided me in my battles against the UC bureaucracy, and generally made life easier. Kathy Klingenberg, Mary Quisenberry, Joan Brunn, Judy Lyman and Deb Morrison also helped me greatly in San Diego, as did Candace Smith did in Vermont. Dora Rodriguez and Donna Barnes, as well as some work study students, have been wonderful during my years at Texas Tech. I would also like to thank the anonymous folks in Texas Tech's Library Express department as they have quickly accessed and delivered a variety of resources.

Among the staff at Columbia University Press I would like to thank Kate Wittenberg, Senior Executive Editor, who not only tolerated all of my questions, but was also very quick to respond. She made the process much easier than I had expected. James Burger and James Short were also quite helpful in the editorial process. Leslie Bialler made the gruesome processes toward the end—copy-editing, indexing, proofing—far less painful than I would have imagined, and his good humor was always welcome, as well. Creative Director Linda Secondari and designer Lisa Hamm were very helpful with the final stages of production, as were Judy Zielinski and David Espinosa at Impressions Book and Journal Services, Inc.

The comments and suggestions that I have received from all of these sources have significantly enhanced this book. However, the remaining flaws are my own responsibility, as I can be nearly as stubborn as my daughter, and, like her, I have not always listened.

My greatest debts are to my family. My mother, Beulah, sparked my interest in international relations long ago, unintentionally setting me out on this path. My daughter, Jessica, has often inspired me to work harder—to finish up so I can get home and play with her. I owe my wife, Katherine, for financial support during my graduate school years, for her editorial skills, which significantly improved my writing, and her emotional support during the many career swings. It is to these three women in my life (ok, two women and a big, big girl) that this book is dedicated.

Stephen M. Saideman
December 2000

The Ties That Divide

