THE INTERNATIONAL SPECTATOR VOLUME XXXVI, No. 4, October - December 2001

The Wars of 911

Simon Serfaty

Simon Serfaty is Di rec tor of Euro pean Stud ies at the Center of Strate gic and International Studies (CSIS) in Wash ing ton, DC. He is also Profes sor of US for eign policy and University Eminent Scholar at Old Dominion University (ODU), Norfolk, Virginia.

For much of the twentieth century, Americans who waged Europe's wars were asked to un der stand the his tory of the peo ple they were de feat ing no less than that of the peo ple they were saving. Now, en tering the twenty-first century, as Europeans help respond to a war launched against America, it is just as important for them to understand American history. For it is only in the context of this history that peo ple abroad can fully grasp the depth of emo tions caused by the at tacks of September 2001. These events will dominate the nation's collective memory for gen era tions to come – and they will con di tion US poli cies for sev eral more years. Allies and friends may be dis mis sive of such a re action to the hor rors of this violence in America. These are the ways of his tory. That may well be true. But this is not the American way – dis tant from war and in vul ner able to at tack.

This, how ever, is not about Amer ica alone: it is about his tory re as serting it self over an experience that was de signed to end the evils of his tory not only for America, but also for like-minded coun tries in Europe and else where. Los ing the bat tle against terror would be to accept a new global anarchy that would leave most coun tries at the mercy of such evil, lest they sur ren der their sov er eign will to the ni hil is tic will of the most ex trem ist or gani sa tions at home and abroad. Ab sent the will to use force to fight and eradicate these or gani sations, gov ern ments will turn against their own citi zens with the kind of ju di cial re forms that will deny the democratic ways to do justice. These may be the primi tive pref er ences of groups and coun tries that wage bat tle in the name of the prac tices that pre vailed at the close of the first millen nium, around the year 911. But with the sec ond millen nium barely be hind us, they are not the ways that demo cratic coun tries earned in their streets, as well as on the battlefields, against the forces of tyr anny.

As these new wars are waged – the wars of 911 – they may prove to be a catalyst for reinforced ties between the United States and the states of Europe.

THE WARS OF 911

A new anarchy?

The enor mity of the risk was un der stood in Amer ica, where Presi dent George W. Bush im me di ately iden ti fied this act of ter ror as an act of war. Ne go tia tions were never an op tion: over what and with whom? The mag ni tude of the kill ing – in ex cess of the of fi cial to tals of both the Revolu tion ary War and Pearl Har bor com bined – made it im pos si ble to set tle this war in a court of law. If the use of US mili tary force could not be con doned in such an ob vi ous case, when would it be used and for what reasons? In any case, the perpetrators of the killing were not in ter ested in any plau si ble goal that might con ceiva bly serve as a focus for negotiations. For too long, their steadfast commitment to terror was met with a per sis tent be lief in ap pease ment, not with stand ing the many words and the few cruise missiles that followed earlier attacks against barracks in Bei rut, Ma rines in Moga dishu, the US em bassy in Nai robi, or a US ship off the shores of Yemen.

More than a ter ror ist act, this pointed to an en tirely differ ent kind of war. Wars are expected to originate in or gan ised entities whose as sets (territorial and oth erwise) offer a basis for effective deterrence, pre-emptive attacks or even destructive retaliation. But these are wars launched by the have-nothings of the slums against the have-it-alls of Western democracies – conflicts "between the world where the state exists and the world where it does not".¹ That does not shape up like an easy bat tle. Hob bes' First Man, con demned to a life that is "poor, nasty, brut ish, and short" may yet be the fu ture's win ner, as he faces a pam pered Last Man who has grown more complacent and too permis sive. No won der if the re sult ing war finds its mid dle man in Rus sia, a coun try well in formed about mat ters of both war and ter ror, and where VIa di mir Putin can now dis miss a "mod ern civi liza tion [that] had grown fat, slow and lost the capacity for re sis tance". Where Bush weeps an America that "lost a piece of [its] soul" on Sep tem ber 11, his new "friend" Putin re joices over the fact that on that day "man kind has ma tured".²

Our first con clu sion is, there fore, that the year 2001 may stand in His tory as another revolutionary transformation of warfare. This transformation has been slow and tragic, be gin ning af ter the Cru sades and early in the six teenth cen tury, when the wid en ing use of gun pow der ended the "game quality" of war – an al legedly no ble art wor thy only of Chris tian kings and knights, while the great ma jor ity of the people re mained pow er less, ig no rant and mostly in differ ent to conflicts that did not truly af fect or even touch them. With the com bat ants able to kill each other from a dis tance, war be came pro gres sively "the con tinua tion of poli tics by other means", an ac tion de signed to pro tect and en hance the raison d'e tat that de fined

¹ R. D. Kaplan, The Com ing An ar chy: Shat ter ing the Dreams of the Post Cold War (New York: Random House, 2000); E. Hobs bawm, On the Edge of The New Cen tury, in conversation with Antonio Po lito (New York, NY: The New Press, 2000) p. 37.

² See the full text of Presi dent Bush's news conference of Oc to ber 11 2001, The Wash ing ton Post, Oc to ber 12 2001, pp. A20- 21. Putin is quoted in The Wash ing ton Post, Oc to ber 9 2001, p. A16.

SIMON SERFATY

the West phalian state sys tem.³

That was not all, how ever. For war to gain the to tal qual ity it has en joyed during our lifetime, it needed more protagonists and better weapons. Thus, in the nine teenth cen tury, public masses were brought into each con flict – con scripts in wars they en dorsed with an en thu si asm that peaked in August 1914. With more com bat ants ren dered avail able for an ever larger number of nation- states, but also within an increasingly global security environment that outgrew the geographic limitations in Europe, technological ad vances gave war the tools needed to fight more efficiently and over longer distances. Even now, his to ri ans are in awe of the de hu man is ing killing, from the Somme to Hi roshima, in curred for rea sons that few re mem bered as they were or dered to their death or cre mated in their sleep. The events of September 11 were, to repeat, different: an un precedented mix ture of both war and ter ror, de signed to kill with out any lim its and even with out weap ons and for no iden ti fi able goal. The goal is not merely to de feat the kind of en emy that could dare launch such a war, but to de feat this kind of war al to gether.

The new normalcy

"His tory," wrote Zbig niew Brzez in ski, "teaches that a super power can not long remain dominant unless it projects ... a message of worldwide relevance" – relevance not only to the bourgeoisie (namely, the democratic allies) but also the people (namely, the oth ers).⁴ Or, as John Hil len once put, "Great pow ers don't do win dows." This is not about power, but the will to use it and, literally, give war a chance. Nor is this about ter ror, but the un will ing ness to en dure it. But this is also not only about confrontation but also about reconciliation. Or, as stated by Britain's Min is ter for Europe Pe ter Hain, on Oc to ber 31 2001, "win ning the peace is part of winning the war".

Lest the seeds of ter ror be al lowed to bloom in definitely in the future, the war can not, there fore, be limited to its military dimensions even while it is being waged militarily. In other words, how ever necessary and even imperative the use of military force is, it cannot be sufficient be cause on its own it will not be effective. To "restore peace and stability", as pledged by the NATO Article 5, will de mand a multidimensional strategy, a mix ture of the Man hat tan Project and the Mar shall Plan, not because either serves as a model for the future but because contemporary variations of both will be in dispensable parts of the future. During World War II, the Man hat tan Project had to do with the develop ment and ap plication of over whelming force to defeat the enemy and lead the al li ance to vic tory in the war. After the enemy had been defeated, the Mar shall Plan (and its counter part for Ja pan) had to do with the generosity and compassion needed to win the peace. Both together shaped the credibility of US war time power and post war lead er ship.

³ See J. U. Nef, War and Human Progress; an Es say on the Rise of In dus trial Civi li za tion (Cambridge, MA: Har vard Uni ver sity Press, 1950) pp. 24 ff.

⁴ Z. Brzezinski, Out of Con trol: Global Tur moil on the Eve of the Twenty- First Cen tury (New York: Char les Scribner's Sons, 1993) p. 89.

THE WARS OF 911

In short, there can and will be no reconciliation without reconstruction of the failed states that are the main bat tle ground of the new nor malcy. That is the les son that was learned after World War II. Grossly ig nored by the United States and its al lies during the past dec ade, this les son will hope fully not be ne glected during the coming months, when a renewed commit ment on the part of the vic to rious or dominant countries will have to be made tangible and convincing. "Terrorism," wrote Chalmers John son in a recent book, "strikes at the in no cent in or der to draw at tention to the sins of the invulnerable."⁵ If ne glect is a sin, then the ne glect of those parts of the world where the Cold War was waged and won was indeed sinful whether the areas of neglect were territorial divisions, social degradation, economic collapse, religious humiliation or a combination of all. Past the war, and be yond Af ghani stan and even Al Qaida, the goal of the grand coa li tions of 911 is to ad dress the un fin ished busi ness of the Cold War. Some of that busi ness is ter ri torial, some is political, some is economic, some is societal, and some is simply be yond words and hence, be yond definition. But none can be ignored if the un conditional defeat of the enemy does not carry with it the true absolution of the pre vailing powers. This is not just a matter of elementary justice: it is also a question of fun da men tal self-interest.

A coalition of coalitions

The threat of a new nor malcy that would be in au gu rated by the at tacks of Sep tember 11 was well un der stood in Europe. As French Presi dent Jac ques Chi rac put it, "This time, it was New York; next time, it could be Paris, Ber lin or Lon don." In each Euro pean coun try, there are many tar gets. The ex pres sion of a nation's iden tity, these are not only easy to hit (of ten with struc tures vul ner able to in di vid ual acts of terror requiring limited sophistication), they are also easy to enter (not only as pub lic monu ments, but also be cause of their fre quent prox im ity to a sym bol of the Ameri can pres ence in the des ig nated coun try). In other words, Eu ro pe's soli dar ity with an act of war against the United States was also ex tended as a mat ter of selfinterest no less than on Ameri ca's be half.

Ameri ca's sur prise is it self sur pris ing. If no sup port from the al lies in Europe, where from? Would it be that Ameri cans have learned so lit tle dur ing the past 50 years that they still view Europe in adversarial terms, and thus misunderstand, and even ig nore, what Europe is and, above all, feels, rela tive to America? Or, to make matters worse, have Americans grown too comfortable with the anti-Americanism that is said to pre vail abroad, per haps as the extension of the democratic tolerance expected from a be nign he gem ony à l'américaine.

The les son, here, should have been learned a long time ago - that America can not iso late it self from the world, ei ther be cause of its policies or be cause of an al leged iso lation ist vo cation. For one, US in terests are too widely spread to per mit any mean ing ful dis en gage ment and too im por tant to be left to the good will or capabilities (or lack thereof) of others. In addition, the spontaneous display of soli dar ity that grew out of America's plight also serves as a reminder that even a power without peers, like America, cannot be without allies, especially among like-minded coun tries that share values and in terests.

⁵ C. John son, Blow back: The Costs and Con se quences of Ameri can Empire (New York: Henry Hold, 2000) p. 33.

SIMON SERFATY

"The mis sion," point edly noted Sec re tary of De fense Don ald Rums feld, "determines the coalition." But conversely, will the coalition determine the mission, and if not, who will? For Rumsfeld, but also for most Americans, the answer is clear. This is not Ko sovo, or even the Gulf war, when the use of US power was argued pri mar ily in terms of the al lies' needs – thereby providing some just if ic ation for the multilateralframework within which the war developed. This is a war that other coun tries are join ing, or will join, with America as the as ser tively explicit coali tion leader, as a mat ter of might (its domi nant power) but also as a mat ter of right (as the pri mary vic tim of the ini tial at tack). "The great est dan ger to the war on terror ism," con cluded a re cent edi to rial of The Wash ing ton Post, "is not that the Bush ad mini stra tion will re sort to uni lat er al ism. It is that the United States will fail to act aggressively and creatively enough, over time, to break the current coalition apart."⁶

Admittedly, the leadership assumed by the Bush administration during the formative phase of coalition-building was lauda bly flexi ble, and showed an effective respect for the lim its of each ally's contributions. The very idea of a "coalition of coalitions" – first used by Sec retary Rums feld at the early stage of war planning – reflected a US commitment to a comprehen sive strat egy that would be, as the French would put it, tous azi muts (multidimensional) and à la carte. Within such a set ting, America has not expected 100-percent follower-ship from all its allies in all in stances. Each subset of the grand coalition was to include countries that were not only willing but also capa ble, and not only countries that were both will ing and capa ble but also nec es sary. In Af ghani stan, for ex ample, Brit ain was will ing and capa ble, but France, Ger many and It aly were seem ingly not deemed nec es sary – ir respective of will ing ness and capa bili ties – for the open ing phase of the mili tary campaign in Afghanistan. As the campaign unfolded, the perspective changed, and of fers to con trib ute were ac cepted.

Yet, not with standing the emphasis placed on coalition-building and consultation, a strategy of selective multilateralism hardly hides the pronounced uni lateral ist drift that remains in the US ap proach to the new nor malcy. That drift is most ap par ent with Presi dent Bush. Events are not an ob stacle to lead er ship, as Prime Min is ter Har old McMil lan once ob served. Events are the stuff of lead er ship. For some, lead er ship is about mim ick ing his toric lead ers who faced and over came com para ble events. In Oc to ber 2001, some al ready de scribed Tony Blair's tones as "Churchillian", even though Winston Churchill can hardly be remembered as Roosevelt's ambassador-at-large around the world. For others, leadership is about exploiting opportunities. Russian President VIa dimir Putin has used terror to de fine a community of in ter ests with the United States and other West ern states that had not been seen since 1945. For yet others, these opportunities are more politically trivial, for example, to gain an ad van tage on an opposition over whelmed by the public support usually extended to the major ity in war time.

^{6 &}quot;The Coa li tion and the Mis sion", The Wash ing ton Post, Oc to ber 21 2001, p. B6.

THE WARS OF 911

As President Bush seized the moment to re define him self, with re mark able ease and even excellence, as a wartime leader, his rhetoric escalates into the realm of the de sir able but be yond the scope of the do able. Now, the war is "a fight to save the civilized world and values common to the West, to Asia, to Is Iam". It is indeed, a "crusade" although one that would remain multi-denominational and compassion ate. "No gov ernment," Bush told his Chinese hosts in Oc to ber, "should use our war against ter ror ism as an excuse to prose cute minori ties within their borders." Ours, he had pas sion ately pleaded a few days ear lier, is "a great nation ... a freedom-loving nation. A compas sion ate nation, a nation that under stands the values of life." This is in deed a doc trine, one that of fers evan gelic tones as it of fers re demp tion with a "sec ond chance" for those who re pent. But most omi nously, it is also a doctrine that prom ises pun ish ment for the sin ners and evil- doers.⁷

"We're watch ing ... very care fully," warned Bush on Oc to ber 11, in di rect refer ence to Sad dam Hussein but also any other re gime that "will have to pay a price" if they "har bor a ter ror ist". There should be no mis take: the lan guage is jus ti fied. Be cause the ar ith met ics of risk- taking have changed since Sep tem ber 11, so must change, too, the willingness to take chances on what hostile groups, regimes or states might not only be able, but also be will ing to do. Where there are the ca pabili ties to do evil, it must now be as sumed that there may be a will, and where there is a will there is a risk that is no longer acceptable and must be, therefore, preempted. Re ports of a split within the Bush ad mini stration, be tween the ad mini stration and Con gress, or within Amer ica it self are ex ag ger ated. Dif fer ences are not over whether Iraq is a cen tral part of the new war, but when and how it should be ad dressed.

For coa li tion mem bers, how ever, the an swer may not be as clear. Con sul tation does not presuppose a consensus, but is designed to permit and mold it. Con sul ta tion over Iraq and other sus pects will take place, as it should; but so will ac tion, as it must, even in the ab sence of a con sen sus. For, in the end, this war will not be won so long as America and its allies do not end the risks of terror that would come out of a regime that has re peat edly dem on strated its com mit ment to terror.

The Wars of 911 will be a decisive test of America's credibility as a durable power. That test extends beyond its ability to win the war, which is something America rarely fails to do. It has to do with America's ability to improve its relations with other parts of the world where its message has been irrelevant or even destructive. As the battle against a new anarchy is waged, and as the search for a new global order is launched, the transatlantic community of values built during the Cold War will endure and even be completed if it is sustained by a community of action defined by a shared interest in the unconditional defeat of terror and its sponsors. That will require bold and visionary leadership on both sides of the Atlantic. Failure is not an option.

⁷ See Presi dent Bush's news con fer ence of Oc to ber 11 2001, and me dia re ports of his meet ing with Presi dent Ji ang Zemin on Oc to ber 19: The Wash ing ton Post, Oc to ber 12 2001, pp. A20- 21, and Oc to ber 21 2001, p. A25, re spec tively.

SIMON SERFATY